

Hit Week: Bringing the Cool Sounds of Italy to NYC, LA, and Miami

Mario Gates (October 03, 2011)

A consortium of bands and musicians representing Italy's popular music scene will be performing in the US for a triple-city tour known as Hit Week (Oct 10th - 16th). Hit Week artists vary wildly, but they share a certain spirit. They flirt with local sounds, satirize local conditions, climb local charts, and pack local stadiums with hundreds of thousands of dedicated fans.

There is more to Italian music than “Volare, Verdi's operas and , mandolin melancholy and maudlin mafia soundtracks. So Francesco Del Maro, who has been immersed in the Italian music industry for 15 years, decided things had to change and he threw a party and got dozens of hip Italian musicians to L.A. for a multi-night, multi-venue blow out.

That was two years ago. Now, Hit Week (October 10-16, 2011) has blossomed into a three-city festival thanks in part to support from Italian institutions, highlighting the catchiest and edgiest music Italy has to offer. On major stages and in intimate clubs in New York City, L.A., and (for the first time this year) Miami, wild-eyed Zappa devotees and electro-powered rock, sleek globally inspired jazz and dubbed-out trip hop collide for a whirlwind romp through the Italian music scene.

For Hit Week, it's about power and savvy, not origins. “Hit Week doesn't focus on the music that's recognizably from Italy,” explains Del Maro. “The language isn't important. We're looking for music of global caliber; that's so good, it doesn't matter where it's from.” This formula has worked: In its short history, Hit Week's audiences have doubled and the festival has established a foothold in some of the toughest U.S. markets.

“There's nothing better than seeing young Americans in their 20s shouting into their cell phones at a show about a group they've just seen,” remarks Del Maro, festival curator and instigator. “When you hear them rave about a band, that they can't believe this is Italian music, it's just amazing.” Though broadly appealing, Hit Week's artists have a distinctly Italian spirit. Several hail from the country's unsung musical hotspots—like the increasingly popular travel destination of Puglia—scenes few Americans are aware of.

The artists participating are: Subsonica, who make electro-laced rock with catchy hooks, big sounds, and intense appeal, Caparezza, a wacky Adriatic alt-rocker who makes devilishly clever pop, Nicola Conte and his super-cool grooves and worldly sounds put polished spin on jazz, Casino Royale, the slick secret agents of Italian trip hop, Après La Classe who make dry humor and uptempo world beats from Puglia (back by popular demand) and Erica Mou, the Italian Alanis Morissette who mixes acoustic flair with thoughtful intensity.

Hit Week artists vary wildly, but they share a certain spirit. They flirt with local sounds, satirize local conditions, climb local charts, and pack local stadiums with hundreds of thousands of dedicated fans. Subsonica have scored numerous number one hits in Italy, making them the current darling of the rock scene. Caparezza sells out major arenas on a regular basis, thanks to his high-energy, always changing, innately quirky shows.

Italian artists are also quietly attracting the attention of international heavyweights, be they edgy producers or major labels. Nicola Conte just signed a deal with international jazz mainstays, Impulse. Casino Royale have teamed up with Scottish DJ Howie B (who's worked with everyone from Tricky to U2) to trade dub breaks and licks. Rising star Erica Mou is working with Bjork's producer, Valgeir Sigurðsson, whose shimmering electronic touches unveil new facets of Mou's raw, personal songs.

Along side these major acts and hot newcomers, Hit Week will showcase the best of Italy's burgeoning crop of emerging music, selected via Facebook contest, thanks to the involvement of the Italian Minister of Young Generation. Young bands get to travel to the U.S. and play for new listeners and industry heavyweights alike. “It's been great for artists just starting out,” explains Del Maro. “Some participants from previous years went on to play various major U.S. festivals.”

Hit Week aims not only to bring creative young Italians to the U.S.; it's reaching out to young Americans, getting them exposed to the coolest moments of the Italian scene. As part of its ongoing partnership with local universities, the festival is arranging several meet-and-greet opportunities at local colleges (UCLA, Columbia, University of Miami) that will bring together artists and audiences in a casual, intimate setting.

“Hit Week shows that Italian artists are second to none,” Del Maro says. “We are not coming from the third world of music, but have something new to tell the world.”
