The daughter of an immigrant, in 1984 Geraldine Ferraro became the first woman candidate for national office, vice president. She began her professional life working part-time as a civil lawyer in her husband's real estate firm, working occasionally for other clients and did some pro bono work for women in family court. She also engaged in local activism. 1970 marked the beginning of her political career as president of the Queens County Women's Bar Association. Her first full-time political job was Assistant District Attorney for Queens County in 1974. In 1978, she successfully ran for congress and became a protégé of Tip O'Neil. After three successful campaigns, in 1984 Walter Mondale picked her as his vice-presidential candidate. Post-1984 elections saw Ferraro in a number of roles that ranged from senatorial candidate, pundit on CNN's Crossfire, to partner in law firms. She continued to be outspoken on numerous issues along the way. After a long illness battling multiple myeloma, she passed away March 26, 2011.
